Director's Note

“Every picture tells a story, just not always the one we think it does,
or the one we want it to show.”

—The Guardian review

“In the light of recent events...there are images that sear themselves into our consciousness.” This line from Elinor Cook’s play addresses the viral internet images that once seen, are unforgettable. The protesting students in Parkland, Florida. Charlottesville. The drowned refugee boy washed up on a Mediterranean beach. In the Middle East, the harrowing video of Neda Agha-Soltan during the 2009 Green Revolution in Tehran, the pepper-sprayed woman in the red dress at an Istanbul protest, the nameless “blue bra girl” being dragged from Tahrir Square.

Image of an Unknown Young Woman is British playwright Elinor Cook’s second staged play, but she is the 2013 winner of the prestigious George Devine Award for Young Playwrights. In this play, Cook questions not only what we make of the viral images with which we’re bombarded, but also what we do with them. Ours is the Midwest premiere of a show that London critics called “explosive” (Guardian) and “a gripping look at rage and revolution” (Evening Standard) in its focus on manipulation, media-sparked protest, ethical ambiguity, and the contagion of violence. A play that offers no easy solutions, Image reflects our historical moment. Although set in an unnamed city in the Middle East, it could take place anywhere there is a repressive regime and impassioned resistance—and people who respond to these images from a distance.

IMAGE OF AN UNKNOWN YOUNG WOMAN

By Elinor Cook

Winner of the 2013 George Devine Award for Most Promising Young British playwright

Directed by Lesley Delmenico

Image of an Unknown Young Women is written for a diverse cast of eight. Three characters play multiple roles, ranging from children to a dictator and his/her henchmen.

A young woman in a yellow dress has been shot by the police. As the video goes viral, a revolution begins. Meanwhile, Ali and Leyla are panicking, since they've uploaded the footage and the authorities are after them. Across town, in the midst of the chaos, Yasmin searches for her missing mother. And halfway around the world, an American woman tries to help. All are caught up in the effects of this violence, as events begin to spiral out of control. This play is imagined around recent images that have circulated globally, and asks uncomfortable questions about what we might do in similar circumstances.
